By B. N. SMITH

(McClure Syndicate—WNU Service.)

DR. LA MOTT looked at the small, exquisite woman in the chair beside his desk. Vaguely he sought to bridge the chasm of those ten intervening years.

"You knew Harvey died, didn't you, Louis?"

"No, I didn't, Dolores. I'm sorry." He stopped abruptly. He'd always known that she was not for him. And, of course, Dolores being Dolores, it was no doubt best. Still, if she had loved him, instead of Harvey, perhaps . . .

"Ten years is a long time, Dolores," he said slowly. "Tell me about yourself. What have you been doing?"

"I'm afraid I haven't been useful, like you, Louis." Then her face lighted; her eyes became eager, animated. "But I've tried to make a good job of raising Harvey Jr. I wish you could see him," she added softly.

"Let's see. How old is he now?"

"He's fourteen." She looked into her handbag and took out a small photo. "Here's his latest."

"He has his mother's eyes."

"But not his mother's disposition. I've trained him away from that," she said moodily. Then her eyes were eager again. "He finishes high school this month. From there he goes to the university, then Harvard and Oxford. His teachers say he has a wonderful mind and will go a long way, if he has a chance." Her voice trailed off wearily.

"I don't doubt it," Dr. LaMott said seriously, "with such a mother. But, you, Dolores, how have you been. Any more trouble with that lung?"

"Oh, I've been up and down. If you hadn't been so far away I'd have had one of your famous diagnoses, Louis. I've never met anyone so unerring."

"The same old flatterer," he laughed. But he was pleased. "Suppose we try one now."

He reached for his stethoscope and adjusted it to her chest, spot by spot.

"Dolores, you must take a rest. Take it here in my sanitarium!" he said suddenly.

"Oh, that would be lovely!" she said in pleased surprise. Then, thoughtfully: "I have some things I must attend to first..."

"I don't want to frighten you, but if you drive back to Yuma—" His voice was infinitely tender as he bent over her. "Let me take care of you, Dolores," he begged. "Give me that much." Her eyes opened as though wakening from a dream, and, aghast, he saw a soul in torment. The next instant the veil was drawn.

"I really must go, Louis," she said. "But I'll come back."

"Then you must go by train, Dolores," he said decisively. She looked and saw Louis at rest on the expensive coupe at the curb. She shook her head, started to speak, then suddenly she was the radiant Dolores of his dreams.

"If I promise, to that extent, you'll have to help me cash a check for expenses. I didn't know I was to travel in state."

"That's easy. Come around here and make it out; I'll endorse it and have Miss Johnson bring you the cash."

* * *

Again the shrill siren of the ambulance sounded and, once more, Dr. LaMott was called to the receiving room. The nurse pushed back tangled hair from a white face and he looked into Dolores' eyes.

Her lips were moving, but no sound came as he bent over her. She realized it and laid her finger on his lips, with a weak, negative movement of her head. He watched her, puzzled. Then, suddenly, he recoiled.

She was staring fast; the pulse was weaker, every beat an effort. Her eyes moved in a last, desperate plea. He leaned over her.

"Yes, Dolores," he whispered. Faintly her lips returned his kiss as her heavy eyelids closed, shutting out the glad light.

* * *

"Of course, Dr. LaMott," said the investigator from the insurance company, "we're not doubting your report. Her death was, apparently, accidental; all the eyewitnesses agree on that point. But—if she had been killed the day before, we would have saved thirty thousand dollars because the money to cover her past due premium was wired from this town about an hour before she was struck. And here's another strange thing. The finance companies had taken everything she had. Cars, real estate, furniture—even her furs were mortgaged.

"Now," he paused thoughtfully, "what I'd like to know is where did she get the money for the premium?"

"Is your company going to contest the claim?" asked Dr. LaMott quietly.

"No—our evidence would seem nothing more than a coincidence to a jury."

When the door had closed on his visitor, Dr. LaMott picked up an envelope and extracted a check, to which was attached a pink slip marked "No Funds."

He struck a match and watched the flame consume both check and slip.

25 Per Cent of Farms Have Electric Service

Approximately one farm in every four now has high line electric service, while only one farm out of every nine had electricity in 1935. A total of 1,700,000 farms now have electricity, according to the estimate recently made by the Rural Electrification administration, as compared with 743,954 in 1935.

The REA has brought electricity to a total of 400,000 farms since its inception in 1935. More than half of these farms, or 225,000, were connected up in 1939, when the agency received $140,000,000. It had previously been geared to a $40,000,000-a-year program, and this year it is again being cut to the 40 million level. Percentage of U. S. farms electrified:

1935	10.9
1936	11.6
1937	15.4
1938	18.2
1939	20.6
1940	25.0

Soybean Acreage Expands

Another large increase—about 16 per cent—in the acreage of soybeans is in prospect, as indicated by farmers who have reported their "intentions to plant" to the United States department of agriculture. Not until 1934 did U. S. farmers plant as many as 5,000,000 acres of soybeans grown alone—that is, excluding plantings where soybeans are seeded with another crop, such as corn. Last year the soybean acreage was about 9,000,000.

Combating Fifth Column On the Fourth

One year ago, on July 4, 1939, the Reading (Pa.) Times came out with an edition that was "censored" as it would be if published under a totalitarian government. The above is a reproduction of the front page. Nearly everything on the page had to be "crossed" out. The edition showed graphically what would be prohibited on the Fourth of July in any newspaper published under Communism, Fascism, or Nazism. In the language of today, the Fourth of July edition was aimed at Fifth column activities.

Important Ball Game Saturday

Appomattox has two important ball games this week-end Saturday at the Leg Theatre diamond, Appomattox will meet the strong Craddock Terry team from Lynchburg. The Appomattox, Craddock Terry and Buena Vista teams are tied for the lead in the Skyline League and the games this week-end will settle the lead for a while anyway, for Craddock Terry plays Buena Vista on Sunday.

Appomattox's Sunday game is at Alfavista.

If grounds and weather permits Appomattox's Skyline team will play Crewe here this afternoon in a 4th of July game.

Although held to a one hit last Saturday by Thomas of Big Island, Appomattox scored three times in the eighth inning to win the ball game, three to one. Ciola hurled five hit ball for Appomattox.

The game was a thriller and Ciola got Appomattox's lone hit.

Sunday Appomattox won from Hampton Looms at Bedford 12 to 4.

RED CROSS CAMPAIGN

The Red Cross War Relief Campaign is still in progress in Appomattox county, with more than one-third of the goal of $1000 still to be raised.

Rev. L.C. Shearer, county chairman stated this week that national officials had expressed satisfaction at the response from this county to date, but had urged continuance of the campaign in view of the continued great need for war relief. Mr. Shearer is requesting all church committees to make prompt reports of amounts collected.

In answer to many questions, it has been announced that funds recently appropriated by Congress to the Red Cross relief work in no way take the place of the $20,000,000 Relief Fund sought through voluntary contributions. It is further stated that funds and supplies sent to Europe are administered through personal representatives of the American Red Cross who are there for that purpose and are not under control of military or political forces in Europe.

We are informed that David K. E. Bruce of Charlotte county will go to London at once as representative of the Red Cross.

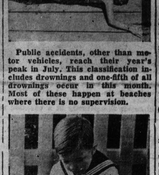
Have a Good Time This 4th of July, But, Take It Easy!

Every July 4th all America turns out for one big day of fun. This celebration is, of course, "fitting and proper," but always present is the specter of accident and tragedy. Here are some of the main reasons accidents occur in such large numbers and a hint or two on how to avoid them:

According to the National Safety Council, accidents of all types claimed 8,800 lives last July. Traffic accidents accounted for 2,850 of these. July's accident losses are 25 per cent higher than that of the average month. Be smart and drive carefully. Don't be a road-hog or a show-off.

Careless campers like the one above, just ready to toss a lighted cigarette to the winds, are responsible for many costly fires on the nation's big holiday. Be careful and thoughtful this Fourth.



That "natural-tan" we all envy, and some of us try to obtain in a single day's exposure to the sun on the Fourth, can be a dangerous thing. Not only is sunburn painful but there is the ever-present danger of heat prostration.

Fireworks add greatly to July's high accident rate. Despite widespread legislation against this common cause of blindness and infection many small children continue to hold private fireworks displays, with disastrous results.

New Taxes Bring A Rise In Prices

People To Pay More To Finance National Defense Program

Appomattox, along with the rest of the United States began to share the load of national defense budgets this week, as a variety of new taxes went into effect. Starting out Monday morning, it was found that prices had gone up all along the line. In particular, items affected include cigarettes, gasoline, whiskey and admission prices at places of amusement.

The price of gasoline went up one-half a cent per gallon and the motorist now pays thirty-two and one-half cents in taxes every time he buys five gallons of gasoline.

At the same time the tax on motor oil went up half a cent and a new law increases the sale tax on new automobiles.

Likewise the the tax on cigarettes was boosted half a cent package and practically put a stop to two for a quarter sales.

Those attending the movies now find the admission price at twenty-eight cents instead of twenty-five.

Patrons of state ABC stores find big increases in prices, the federal tax boost being joined by a state increase. The last session of the General Assembly voted a ten per cent boost in liquor prices.

Some expert has figured out that the new taxes will cost the average citizen an extra fifty dollars a year in taxes.

However, the picture is relieved by knowledge that Uncle Sam must be prepared at all costs and that part of this money will be spent in Virginia. Contracts for 169 million dollars of navy vessels were awarded yesterday to Newport News.

Mass Meeting Concerning Camp

A mass meeting open to all citizens of Appomattox town and county will be held at the court house tonight, (Thursday at 7 o'clock for the purpose of discussing the sending of a Negro Veterans CCC Camp to Appomattox to occupy the camp being vacated this week-end by the White Sell Conservation Camp.

A telephone call to Senator Harry Flood Byrd last night revealed that no white camp was available to be sent here. Several letters of protest against the proposed Camp have recently been sent, including a resolution by the county board of supervisors.
